بسم الله الرحمن الرحيم

It Has Not Gone to Claim that It Has Returned!

In a deceptive manner, the intelligence agencies of the Crusader countries began spreading in the media the term "returning and expanding" in relation to developments that took place in the recent months. These events forced the U.S. military command and the United Nations to issue warning reports regarding the burgeoning force of the Islamic State in the operations center of the international Crusader coalition formed to fight it, i.e., Iraq and Sham, where the threat of the Islamic State regaining control exists. Likewise, analysts consider the escalation in the Khilafah soldiers' operations in various areas around the world, and the recent announcement of their existence in other areas, as evidence of the new "expansion" of the Islamic State around the world.

Those who have that new vision of the future war against the Islamic State base their expectations on several indications, which are the Shari'ah, theoretical and material foundations. As for the doctrinal indications, the Crusaders admit their utter failure to distort the creed fo the Islamic State, only achieving limited success in deforming it, by pinning on it the accusation of "Kharaijiyya." Their proof for that charge is the strong adherence of the Khilafah soldiers to that creed despite the fierce war on them, as well as the ongoing and increased support of Muslims to it in various areas around the world. And as long as the doctrine is strong and prevalent, the Islamic State will continue to be attractive to the mujahidin who strengthen its foundations and build its structure, by Allah's permission.

Another indication they count on is the numbers of mujahidin who are willing to join its ranks once it gains control over land. They estimate the number to be around 20,000 Muslims in Iraq and Sham only. Despite how small this number relative to reality, it is terrifying to them, for it is many times more than what it was before Allah granted them control over lands.

Adding to that, the Crusaders view with an eye of apprehension the hard work done by the Khilafah soldiers to undo what is being built by their allies, the murtaddin who rule areas under their control. This work includes killingthose assigned by the Crusaders to rule these areas and force many others to repent and stop supporting them or run away. This matter threatens to crush their fragile structure and enable the return of the Islamic State to fill the vacuum of power based on the Shari'ah of Allah again, even before they accomplish full control over the land. Specifically, they saw the great expertise of the mujahidin in running areas under their control during the past years.

Meanwhile, the Crusaders follow the "harvest of the mujahidin" and monitor developments in the volume of military and security work, and the amount of losses suffered by their allies, in light of the state of constant attrition at the hands of the Khilafah soldiers. Their indication to that is the increasing strength of the Khilafah soldiers and the declining power of the mushrikin. However, that indication does not accurately reflect reality, because the nature of the war fought by the mujahidin requires not to declare all their operations, or the nature of their spread or even their work in a way that reveals their true capabilities. The nature of battles in some areas requires having a low profile and slow pace; otherwise, it will threaten the consistency of that work in the long-term.

At the same time, the intelligence agencies seek to collect any information that could be useful in knowing the size and origins of the Islamic State's financial sources and how it is spent and the extent of spending. This will help them to estimate the current and future capabilities of the Islamic State to fund the work of its various diwans, arm its mujahidin and prepare for major operations in preparation for regaining control over some areas, or even to help the mujahidin in new areas to establish the jihadi work before their announcement of joining the Muslim community.

Through all these indications, the Crusaders and their intelligence and research centers realize that the Islamic State is still indeed remaining. It remains with its doctrine, creed, soldiers and jihad, and it remains to outrage its enemies, control the land and establish the religion in it. Indeed, it will, by Allah's permission, make a quick and powerful comeback to the land from which it withdrew, and the fruits of all their current efforts will be harvested sooner or later.

Based on that, new proposals are being prepared based on the previous expectations. They are based on enacting a plan to contain the Islamic State instead of focusing on the goal to eliminate it, which the Khilafah soldiers have proven to be a difficult task, and all praise is due to Allah, especially as the Crusaders have recognized that they might not have the coalition of more than 80 countries existing to help in the years and maybe decades to come.

It is better for the Crusaders, their allies and all the groups of kufr and riddah to stop talking about the termination of the Islamic State and its return. That matter is long gone, and all praise is due to Allah. It still remains and has not been terminated as the liars claim, and that will never happen, by Allah's permission. Day by day, its soldiers expand the battlefields against the mushrikin until the entire earth will be one battlefield of jihad between the group of faith, with no hypocrisy in it, and the group of kufr, with no faith in it. And Allah is predominant over His affair, but most of the people do not know.